

The Panamanian Cup of Coffee

Panamanian coffees are appreciated for their high quality in the cup. Some reach record prices in the market.

One of the reasons is that the coffee profile of Boquete, from Volcan, a relatively dry area, a contrast to the humid areas of Bajo Mono, offers a medium to high acidity and a low to medium body creating a very balanced flavor.

For its counterpart, on the southern slope of the Baru Volcano, the coffee produced there stands out for its acidity higher than what might be expected due to its relative height, and it is also appreciated for its good body and for being very aromatic. This has made it a highly sought after bean for blending to create espresso coffee.

As for the coffee from the Renacimiento region, it also stands out for its good quality and cup profile with very balanced fragrance, aroma, flavor, sweetness and acidity.

With the exception of these tests with Robusta coffee, in Panama all the beans produced are Arabica coffees of varieties such as Catuai, Caturra, Typica, Catimor, Bourbon, Geisha, Mokita, Pacamara and Obata, among others and although international companies are requesting more and more coffee with a natural process, most of these Panamanian coffees are processed and washed which directly influences the variety and region of cultivation on the quality and sensory characteristics of the final grain (other processes include honey and fermented. Special portions apply only to smaller quantities such as those in micro lots).
